Environmental protection is a global issue with a plethora of protective legislation, enacted as transnational and national regulations and guidelines, aimed at sustainable use of water, soil, air, and biomass. These laws apply not only to the polluter but also to governments, national institutions, and individuals. They are designed to protect human health and ecosystems from the effects of chemical contaminants, to guarantee the quality of natural resources, e.g., potable water and to facilitate the recovery of degraded environments, e.g., contaminated land. It is critical to protect the environment so as to reduce the destruction of eco-systems caused by a myriad of anthropogenic activities. It is more of a moral obligation for humans to protect the environment from pollution and other activities that lead to environmental degradation. It is our responsibility to protect our environment by using natural resources wisely.
